The process, it is estimated, would probably add 5 cents a bushel to the value of the billion and a half bushel The question with which the department is wrestling, however, is whether the bleaching of the grain would not conceal certain defects. The greater part of the enormous cat The greater part of the enormous catterop, it is explained, is "rusty," or affected to such a degree that in many cases animals have refused to eat the grain because of the smell. "Sulphurizing" might enable concealment of that part of the crop which is practically valueless, but it would glso make marketable and useful the slightly affected grain. Decision on the matter will be given in a few weeks.
